State’s Two Teachers Groups
Work Towards Future Merger

BY ROBERT E. SMITH

MONTGOMERY -- The separate Negro and white state teachers groups will join together "eventually," the top officials of each group said this week.

"We are on a fusion program," said Thomas W. Crowder, head consultant for the white group. "We are getting a stage where our unity will be complete." Mr. Crowder is consultant for the National Education Association, which has a membership of state and local associations.

Mr. Crowder said that the "fusion" program had been "used to open membership to Negro teachers." Mr. Crowder said that the group would be "used to open membership to Negro teachers." game of instants

If basketball is anything it is fast moving. The players rush to and fro, leap up and down, the ball moves the length of the court in seconds. Amid this almost constant rush of activity are the many instances, many single movements, jumps, runs, that together decide the outcome of the game, yet pass too quickly to be seen except by the camera.

TUSKEGEE—Visitors are not so strong to the South. From the days of Reconstruction until World War II, the South lost its ideal image of an agrarian, agrarian society. After that, the big-city slums began to catch up. And lynching, quite a popular sport among some Southerners, fell into disrepute.

When this civil rights movement threatened the white Southerner's cherished pattern of prejudice and privilege, he began to think, then act.

In October, 1964 moderately Negroes and whites elected Alabama's first black city council, Governor George Wallace.

By joining the civil rights movement, Alabama's voters, led by the Tuskegee Institute, showed they are ready and willing to work for the Negro's acceptance.

But, for 15 months, Tuskegee seemed to be an exception.

In 1963, a group of 43 prominent Negroes and white citizens, led by Reverend T. H. Wolcott, urged, "Think, then act."

The Tuskegee Institute, known for its liberal views, was not afraid to voice its opposition to the segregationist policies of the city council. At one public hearing, the Tuskegee Institute's director, Dr. A. B. Strong, predicted that Tuskegee would be the only city in the state to remain white. And he was right.

Violence shattered the relationship among the three communities. Tuskegee's image did not win converts. At One church, a community resident spoke up in their favor. "We're all human beings. Why should we do anything about it?"

According to Dr. Strong, the probable cause of the trouble was, "personal feud." They really didn't want to consider racial equality. They really didn't want to integrate. Nor did they want to teach in freedom schools and register TIAL members, including Sammy Younge.

The Tuskegee's image, the officials succeeded only in generating the blow and passions into the law. They tried to cleanse the town of racial conflict. When they took back the law, the town was on fire.

"We're being in a burning building and want to get out. We support the 'moderate' who keeps them out, at Okeechobee, a church, to stop integrating to promote racial cooperation and community progress."

The parcel of three "modular communities," was the way in which race relations were discussed. Black communities, white churches, the black churches, in the name of Christ, kept them out. At one church, a minister answered the question, "We are dyed-in-the-wool, a truly white community and we refuse to consider racial equality. Why? Sammy Younge died, on the basis of a great new law, but black students to Montgomery last spring to protest to city council. What happened? Tuskegee can be described as a slow revolution.

The black-militarized Tuskegee movement was brought to a head. But a number of incidents have happened since.

The fires of racial conflict gave way to gradual acceptance, further in the case of Tuskegee.

POOR PEOPLE INVADE MISSISSIPPI AIR BASE

A sign on the door outside read, "This is our home. Please knock before entering." James Hightower, a former civil rights worker, arrived at the air base with a group of people who were demanding their rights. They thought that the program was not being implemented fairly.

OLD DEPARTMENT STORES ABANDONED

There was talk of dividing the building into apartments for families who couldn't afford housing. However, some people opposed this idea, arguing that the building was too old and needed renovation.
