Senator Told Of Poverty

BY PATRICK J. RYAN

JACKSON, Miss. -- "If you want to help the poor, you have to do something for them," said Mrs. Universal Blackwell of Leflore County.

"We don't have a factory -- nothing but plants. We have children. There's a lot of babies who have a glass of milk in their mouth," Blackwell said.

"There isn't any kind of employment." she said.

"I want it right," said Senator Robert F. Kennedy, a Democrat from Massachusetts, during a recent debate.

"I think it's not unusual for a city to have colored policemen any more," said Kennedy.

"I think we should have them." he said.

"But they're not here," Kennedy said, "because they're not needed."

"We should get a factory," Blackwell said, "and we need something.

This was just one of the many problems faced by Blackwell, a former state senator from Leflore County.

They also heard from one of Mississippi's first two full-time Negro policemen.

"I think it's something I should have been," said one of the policemen.

"I think it's a mistake," said Kennedy.

A Negro Writes of Her Family's Struggle

Margaret Walker, now Mrs. Alexander, was the great-granddaughter of a Georgia planter slave who tried to build a life of freedom for her family.

Mary was Margaret's mother, and she was the greatest storyteller I've ever heard, says Margaret Walker Alexander, the author of "Jubilee."

The story of how Mrs. Alexander came to write "Jubilee" is a sad and complex one. Mrs. Alexander says she is almost as hidebound by the forbidding as her ancestors.

Mrs. Brown died and left her old daughter to the family, and they had to go back to Georgia to look for her, and gather around to welcome her back. Mrs. Alexander says she went back to Georgia to look for her, and gather around to welcome her back.

Margaret Walker Alexander, now Mrs. Alexander, is a different story. The author of "Jubilee" is a different story. The author of "Jubilee" is a different story.

As a young girl, Margaret Walker Alexander heard stories of her family's struggle for freedom. She was inspired by her great-grandmother's story and decided to write a novel about her life.

No More Fights After School Officials Act

by Gail Fulk

ENTERPRISE, Miss.--Like many other Southern school districts, the Enterprise City School System in rural Dale County, Alabama, is trying to prevent schoolyard violence.

The district is under pressure to act against incidents of violence, which have involved students, teachers, and visitors.

The district has already suspended a student for four days for his role in a fight at the high school.

The student, who was not identified by name, told officials that he was provoked by a fellow student who had made racial slurs.

The district has also scheduled a meeting with parents and students to discuss the issue of violence at the school.

The district has also announced a new policy that will suspend students for a minimum of five days for any act of violence.

School officials have also increased security measures, including the deployment of security guards and the installation of surveillance cameras.

The district is working with local law enforcement agencies to prevent future incidents of violence.

The district has also established a task force to develop a comprehensive plan to address the issue of violence at the school.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a curfew for high school students to reduce the risk of violence.

The district is also considering the possibility of implementing a School Resource Officer Program to provide additional support for school security.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a Restorative Justice Program to address the underlying issues that may be contributing to the incidents of violence.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a social-emotional learning program to promote positive relationships and conflict resolution skills among students.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a peer mediation program to provide students with a safe and supportive environment for conflict resolution.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a mental health program to provide students with access to mental health services and support.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a drug and alcohol prevention program to promote healthy decision-making and reduce the risk of drug and alcohol use.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a bullying prevention program to promote a safe and inclusive school environment.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a anti-bullying program to promote respect and inclusion among students.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a anti-violence program to promote safety and security at the school.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a anti-hate program to promote tolerance and respect for all students.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a anti-racism program to promote equality and justice.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a anti-gender bias program to promote respect and inclusion for all students.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a anti-disability bias program to promote respect and inclusion for all students.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a anti-religion bias program to promote respect and inclusion for all students.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a anti-lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer (LGBTQ+) bias program to promote respect and inclusion for all students.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a anti-sexual orientation bias program to promote respect and inclusion for all students.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a anti-sexual expression bias program to promote respect and inclusion for all students.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a anti-political bias program to promote respect and inclusion for all students.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a anti-religious bias program to promote respect and inclusion for all students.

The district is also exploring the possibility of implementing a anti-national origin bias program to promote respect and inclusion for all students.

Coming out for spring practice is just like any other game playing for the Tide. Most opinions digressed along the way, andbeginners don't go straight to the top.

"You won't see me on the field next year," he said. Since he is a freshman who was expected to make the team, he would still give him three years, the remembers, in the South.

Johnson said he was always a member of the football team, the same as white students, he would take any student who qualifies, Coach Bowers said. "We don't care what color their skin, or what color eyes they have, just how they play.

In the past, most Negroes have been left out to play major college football. "White teams now consider recruiting football players from Negro high schools."

"They were qualified, but underrated, " said Personal. "It was a situation that couldn't be improved, we've been told.""
